If You Want To Accelerate Brain
Development In Children, Teach Them Music

Music, the universal language of mood, emotion and desire, connects with us through a wide variety of neural systems. We now know from controlled treatment/outcome studies that listening to and playing music is a potent treatment for mental health issues. 400 published scientific papers have proven the old adage that "music is medicine." In fact, research demonstrates that adding music therapy to treatment improves symptoms and social functioning among schizophrenics. Further, music therapy has demonstrated efficacy as an independent treatment for reducing depression, anxiety and chronic pain. Importantly, music education also appears to accelerate brain development in young children, particularly in the areas of the brain responsible for processing sound, language development, speech perception and reading skills, according to initial results of a five-year study by USC neuroscientists. The Brain and Creativity Institute (BCI) at USC began the five-year study in 2012, in partnership with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Association and the Heart of Los Angeles (HOLA), to examine the impact of music instruction on children's social, emotional and cognitive development. Within two years of the study, the neuroscientists found the auditory systems of children in the music program were maturing faster than in the other children. This enhanced maturity reflects an increase in neuroplasticity, a physiological change in the brain in response to its environment — in this case, exposure to music and music instruction. "The auditory system is stimulated by music," Habibi said. "This system is also engaged in general sound processing that is fundamental to language development, reading skills and successful communication." "Undeniably, there is a biology of music," according to Harvard University Medical School neurobiologist Mark Jude Tramo. He sees it as beyond question that there is specialization within the brain for the processing of music. Music is a biological part of life as surely as it is an aesthetic part. The brain grows in response to musical training in the way a muscle responds to exercise. Researchers at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston discovered that male musicians have larger brains than men who have not had extensive musical training. The cerebellums, that part of the brain containing 70 percent of the total brain's neurons, were 5 percent larger in expert male musicians. Researchers have also found evidence of the power of music to affect neural activity no mat-

Detoxification is another benefit of cupping as it pulls toxins to the surface where they can more easily be dispersed. Increased blood flow to the area is also stimulated to promote healing. Cupping therapy goes back thousands of years and the types of cups used evolved over time. Early records indicate this therapy being used in China, and then throughout other countries in the Middle East. Materials used were bamboo, animal horn, and then glass and these are still in use today in different cultures. They are often used as part of an acupuncture treatment which also includes needling, but sometimes they are used alone. The round glass cups are my personal favorites, and are sometimes referred to as "fire cups" because a flame is introduced into the cup to consume the oxygen within and create a vacuum. Then the cup is quickly inverted onto the area being treated, which has been prepared using a lubricant, and a mild suction is experienced by the patient. The cups are left in

Acupuncturist...

Veronica Cavella Pedersen, L.Ac.

Q.: Like many millions who watched the Olympics, I saw the circular marks on Michael Phelps and other competitors and learned that they came from "cupping". Is this therapy useful for average people who are not Olympic athletes competing at this level?
A.: I am sure I speak for Acupuncturists around the world when I express my gratitude to the Olympic athletes who drew so much attention to the ancient art of cupping. These athletes, the best in the world, were using cupping to accelerate muscle recovery in order to keep up with their grueling schedules. As we saw, some of them competed in multiple events, with not a lot of time between them. This healing technique is not reserved for top athletes however, and average people can also benefit from cupping for a number of health issues.

In addition to promoting muscle recovery, cupping is an effective treatment for pain in the back, neck, legs and arms. Lung problems also respond well to cupping as part of an acupuncture treatment. Although the cups are positioned superficially at the skin level, often on the back, the effect is said to penetrate to a depth of perhaps four inches. For this reason relief can be obtained in cases of asthma, pneumonia, bronchitis, or a chest cold to clear congestion and help open the airways.

place for fifteen to thirty minutes. If there is blood stagnation in the area, the round marks will appear. In color they can range from pink, to red, to a deep purple, and the marks can remain for up to a few days before fading. Some fade very quickly, depending on the patient's condition. The lubricant applied allows for the cups to be moved around to apply a pleasant massage to the area before removing them. Other cups commonly used today are plastic with a rubber suction ball attached at the top. These are applied by squeezing the ball to create suction to the degree desired. These cups are particularly convenient in treating children where a flame can be avoided for safety reasons. Another system of plastic cups often used has the suction delivered through a pump. Acupuncturists use the system they prefer and find most effective for their patients' needs.
